Since I was trained in music as therapy it has helped me in my work because it has allowed me to interact with children with disabilities. Those who cannot speak have expressed their feelings to me so that I can hear them. It also encouraged children to be creative and work in groups. It also motivates children to be active in other activities.

“

What I can say about music as therapy is that it helps me in my daily work and peoples' family life. In my work, when we work with music as therapy it helps each child in their own way. For families, when music as therapy is used for people who have experienced trauma and those who are lonely, it really helps them to become happy in doing their daily activities. Music as therapy helps me to discover the details of each child during the lesson, to know their likes and dislikes. Music as a cure has come to light for all people with mental health problems. I also encourage everyone to love music as therapy and to share it with others. A family that uses music as therapy is free from conflict.

“

I find using music inspiring because music is popular, music is healing medicine, music is life and also music is a source of incomes. You reach your objective at a high rate if you use music in your activities.

Music creates quick impact and facilitates to positively change the society. For example, using music with the children and young people with disability from Urugwiyo Centre and Alivera Centre made them live a purposeful life (some of them are carpenters, tailors,...)
